Being a Transit Operator

Transit Operators usually work alone, without direct supervision, which necessitates a great deal of individual autonomy and responsibility.

Customer relations are the main part of the Transit Operator's daily activities. Transit Operators monitor their passengers and other motorists, while exercising a great deal of tact and diplomacy when dealing with the public.

Technology also plays an increasing role in the communications and scheduling of buses. Transit Operators maintain radio communications with dispatch, and buses are equipped with automatic vehicle location systems as well as Smart Card payment systems.

Transit Operators are responsible for the safe operation of transit vehicles under diverse weather and traffic conditions, and must follow schedule guidelines sometimes under challenging circumstances

All buses are accessible. Transit Operators assist all passengers, including those with mobility devices, to ensure safe travel for our passengers.
